

Hyperspectral imaging continues to expand into new applications providing improved remote detection, identification, and quantification. Ensuring consistent and accurate results will likely become a greater priority as the field advances from demonstrations to use as a routine operational tool. While a significant amount of knowledge can be leveraged from established radiometric calibration practices, hyperspectral imaging poses some unique challenges. This talk will discuss current NIST programs and plans to address application-specific challenges.